What's New at Cooperating Churches?

RECOVERY CONGREGATIONS

We are still recruiting congregation for this initiative. If you would like more information please contact our office or email us.

Think about becoming a Recovery Congregation. How can your organization help with the addiction problem in our community?

Recovery Congregations can provide spiritual and pastoral support. They can view addiction as a disease not a moral issue. They can embrace and support people in recovery, as well as their families. They can provide visible outreach in the community. They can disseminate recovery information. And, they can host recovery groups within their organizations.

See inside for more information.

Family Faith Fellowship Fair

Muskegon County Cooperating Churches presents the organization's first, and hopefully, yearly fundraiser on Saturday July 27, 2019. See the inside for more information.

Gleanings by Tom Wagner

Sabbath Freedom

Following college graduation I served about a year and a half as an intern at Brethren Historical Library & Archives, located at the Church of the Brethren denominational offices in Elgin, Illinois. In addition to working daily with the raw materials of history, the job gave me access to much current news and information from around the denomination and our ecumenical partners. I also became acquainted with many talented and caring volunteers and staff.

One of the perks of the job was that I could frequently hitch a ride with staff traveling to or through Indiana, allowing me to visit family and friends back home. These trips were good opportunities to get to know them better. Many had been seasoned pastors, while others had served on mission fields in Nigeria, India or Ecuador. These folks often had adventurous tales to tell. Being rather young, I had few stories of my own, but these companions often showed genuine interest in my background and future plans.

On one occasion while riding with an associate general secretary and her husband to a college homecoming, we began comparing stories of their Midwestern upbringings with my childhood in eastern Pennsylvania nearly two generations later. In spite of the age difference there were more similarities than we had expected, largely because Brethren Midwestern and urban congregations had assimilated to mainstream culture decades before many eastern congregations. While a few “plain” congregations remain to this day, most of my home church had shed the traditional Dunker wardrobe by the time I was born, with the exception of a few elderly members. Yet some lifestyle patterns persisted. My traveling companions reminisced about youthful conflicts over attending movies on Sunday afternoons, and wondered if I had encountered similar restrictions. I hadn’t. It simply never occurred to me make the request. Attending movies was rare for our household. There was no stated taboo, but it just never became a habit among us. I suspect it may have been a remnant from a time when “worldly amusements” were frowned upon. I’ve been told that one of my great-grandmothers would lecture my Dad and his brother about not playing ball on Sunday afternoons. In her mind, it was a time to sit and visit.

Personally I recall Sundays of my childhood as relatively relaxed days. Dad had the day off of work. We often did visit with relatives. Other times we might take long car rides while Dad listened to Phillies games on the radio. Many times we simply loafed around the house or yard. Of course we nearly always attended Sunday school and church, unless we were ill or the snow was too deep. That rarely happened. It’s a habit I’ve maintain throughout my adult life.

It is sad that our understanding of Sunday or Sabbath observance is so often dominated by a sense of restriction. There is a scriptural basis for seeing it as a regular opportunity for liberation. The version of the Ten Commandments found in Deuteronomy 5:6-21 gives YHWH’s deliverance of Israel from bondage in Egypt as rational for keeping the day holy. Indeed this day of rest applied not only to the Hebrews themselves, but to their servants, livestock and even foreigners in their midst. In Luke’s story about Jesus healing a bent-over woman in a synagogue on the Sabbath follows this theme (13:10-17). The Rev. Dr. Natalie Houghtby-Haddon points out a number of unique points about the story in her book Changed Imagination, Changed Obedience. Unlike other healings and exorcisms, Jesus declares the woman “freed” rather than healed. When the leader of the synagogue reprimands Jesus for breaking the Sabbath with this work of mercy, Jesus responds by pointing that his opponents release (untie) their oxen and asses for water on the Sabbath. Does not a woman, a daughter of Abraham no less, who has been bound for 18 years deserve to be released from her affliction? There are a couple of things going on here—a word play on untying beasts of burden and unbinding a captive woman in addition to making a greater point by use of a lesser example. It also may serve as a reminder of the Deuteronomy text including livestock in the day of rest. Houghtby-Haddon also hears the echoes of another Sabbath when Jesus declared a year of Jubilee at Nazareth in Luke 4:16-30. It was a promise of release to the captives, of good news to the poor of debt cancelation, of giving the soil its Sabbath rest and redistribution of land. This woman experienced that promise fulfilled in release from her long affliction. May each of us come to know Sabbath’s liberty, empowering us for the tasks ahead.
