

Demonology

In my work as a demonologist, I humble myself to the reality that there are learned scholars in this field, far better than I, who expertly label and define the peculiar names and histories of demonic entities. Erudite tomes and conversational treatises pepper the internet in both video and literary forms. I learn much from these other demonologists, as we each seem to focus on a favored area of research. My research on spiritual intuition waterfalls into the ocean of paranormal phenomena and the beings outside of “normal”.

Curiosity requires the temperance of caution, of reverence for the unknown and recognition where it connects to the reality of what we do know. That starting point is verifiable and concrete, allowing new intel to connect with the present moment.

My simple contribution arises from personal experiences and actual encounters with negative forces. Said forces include demons, purgatorial spirits, wraiths, harmful nature beings on the involutory arc, and folks with nothing better to do than harm their fellowman. Anything you can imagine is out there, or in here.

My statement of intent with demonology is to present my personal experience as research data, although qualitative and verifiable only through myself. My experiences undoubtedly overlap or replicate those of other demonologists, so perhaps these similarities add to the collection of data for our field.

Those quantitative parapsychologists who scientifically measure the electromagnetic signatures of our qualitative experiences are the true heroes of our field. Hats off to these teams of brave souls! My work pales in the brilliant light of their creativity, yet my detailed writings may offer tangible suggestions for others to explore.

So, there you have it. As a demonologist, I define myself as an intuitive sensitive who presents research solely from her own experiences. Perhaps you may be entertained or amused, or even intrigued as I am with the curious state of paranormal beings as they interact with our humanity. Again, be careful, be brave, and be.
