Richardson, R. Pre-examination for Certification in Psychodrama, Sociometry and Group Psychotherapy, 1976.

Designed a training tool to test the full knowledge of a psychodramatist who is preparing for certification. It was submitted to the American Board of Examiners in Psychodrama, Sociometry and Group Psychotherapy to provide ideas from the Written Examination. As a result, I was asked to serve on the Board of Reviewers and write the history section of the first national examination. Since that time, I have scored sections of the examinations annually for the Board, and have conducted five on-site evaluations of applicants for certification.

Since the spring of 1990, I had been researching and writing a comprehensive manuscript on eating disorders. In the process of this literature review, I read a large number of research reports containing several research designs. This provided me with an overview of the current designs, their limitations, and the quality of research being completed in neuroendocrinology, psychological assessment, treatment outcome, and other areas. As a consumer of this research and as an author having to qualify the material included in the manuscript, I became more sensitive to the flaws in research design and the need to properly qualify the results and conclusions in the presentation of research results. I also improved my skills at reading medical and psychological research reports.
