I'm no physicist—a fact that should become immediately apparent. But this latest heat and humidity wave has got me wondering about the amount of heat we generate to stay cool and comfortable. Take the dehumidifier I plugged in near the piano after the piano tuner refused to do his job and gave me a lecture on humidity and wood. The dehumidifier worked great—within hours the stickiness disappeared—and, the room seemed at least 10 degrees warmer.

The piano might have been happier, but the room was unbearably hot. Dehumidifiers, like air conditioners and refrigerators, are heat pumps—they move heat from one place to the another. Dehumidifiers remove moisture by allowing it to condense on the cold side of the system—the evaporator coil. Unlike fridges and ACs, though, dehumidifiers dump heat into the same air they're pulling heat from, leading one like me to assume that the net heat change would be zero.
