

Reader's Discussion Guide for The Legacy Letters

A Selection for “The Year of Reading Dangerously” Book Group

---

If you were dying what letters what would you write? And to whom?

Would you want these letters to be read while you're still alive or would you rather they be read after you had passed on?

If there were just three nuggets of wisdom you had to pass on to your children, your family, or friends, what would they be? Would they be different for each group?

Do you think it's important to leave behind “Legacy Letters” to your loved ones? Why? What life's wisdom have you gathered and would like to pass on to others?

Is there anyone in your life has died that you wished you had received a letter from? If so, what do you wish they had said?

The father in The Legacy Letters decided to be alone in a cabin far away in the mountains to die in solitude. What do you think about his choice? Would you want to be alone? Would you want people around you?

Do you think the father grew in his acceptance of his impending death as the letters proceeded?

What three things to you think the father learned in the writing of the letters? What do you think he tried to avoid writing about?

Is he comfortable with his own death?
Does he come to terms with his own death?

Which one of the letters spoke to you most deeply?

---

Carew Papritz is the bestselling author of the multi-awarding inspirational book, The Legacy Letters. For more information, please visit: www.thelegacyletters.com